

The Database Management System (DBMS)

A DBMS is a layer of software inserted between the applications and the data, which attempts to solve these problems. Two essential features of the DBMS are:

- Program-data independence, whereby the storage structure of the data is hidden from each application/user;
- Restricted user access to the data – each user is given a limited view of the data according to need.

